JPY: A small distraction from the BOJ

- ◆ On 19 March, the BOJ announced a few tweaks to its policy easing framework, including a more explicit YCC range
- ◆ USD-JPY fell slightly as the clarified YCC range was larger than what was widely assumed by the market earlier
- ◆ But we expect USD-JPY to quickly resume trading in line with the broader USD direction

USD-JPY fell slightly in the wake of the Bank of Japan's (BOJ) policy review on 19 March 2021.

Notably, the BoJ provided an explicit Yield Curve Control (YCC) range of +/- 25bp around 0% for 10-year yields. Although this range was larger than what was widely assumed by the market in the past (+/-20bp) and was also unexpected (based on a Bloomberg survey of expected outcomes on 11 March), the announcement did not put much downward pressure on USD-JPY – not yesterday when the Japanese media (Nikkei, 18 March) first reported on it, nor today (19 March) when it was confirmed by the BOJ.

In our view, the BOJ timed its announcement well, against the backdrop of rising US yields, thereby minimising (mis)perceptions of it turning less dovish or being backed against the wall (running out of Japanese government bonds to buy). Moreover, the BOJ strengthened its fixed-rate purchase operations (pledged to do it for consecutive days), to emphasise its ability and determination to prevent yields from rising. The BOJ also stressed it will, however, tolerate an undershooting of the YCC range.

There were a couple of other unexpected changes that could have also contributed to the slight decline in USD-JPY: (1) Scrapping the JPY6trn annual target for exchange-traded fund purchases and specifying that subsequent purchases will be focused on Topix ETFs (which caused a broader gauge of Japanese stocks to decline) and (2) New incentives for banks – positive interest rates – to promote lending.

Ultimately, we view these actions as tweaks to the BOJ's monetary policy easing framework. This review was not a game-changer but neither was it pointless. So, we see it as a small distraction against bigger things happening externally. We expect USD-JPY to quickly resume trading according to the broad USD direction. We still see USD-JPY fluctuating with an upward bias over the near term before correcting in 2H21 alongside 10-year US yields later.

A more explicit YCC range did not weigh too much on USD-JPY

The timing of the BOJ announcement couldn't be much better, in our view

Other tweaks include focusing only on buying ETFs for the Topix Index and new lending incentives for banks

We see USD-JPY going slightly higher over the near term, before correcting in 2H21
