Brexit delayed

The UK and EU have agreed to extend the scheduled date of the UK's departure from the bloc to 31 October 2019

The extension is, however, flexible and can be cut short if the UK ratifies the withdrawal agreement

The latest extension keeps open a number of Brexit outcomes, including a "no-deal" departure, an orderly exit or even "no Brexit"

Our views

We believe UK equities are very attractively valued and investors are being rewarded for bearing downside risks

EU agrees to extend Brexit deadline

At an emergency European Council summit of EU leaders on 10 April, the UK and EU agreed to extend the scheduled date of the UK's departure from the bloc to 31 October 2019.

This comes after the UK government has failed to find majority support in the UK Parliament for the withdrawal agreement (or "exit treaty") negotiated with the EU. Recent negotiations with the UK opposition Labour Party to find an agreement that could gain parliamentary support have not yet resulted in any breakthrough.

The length of the agreed extension is likely to be politically challenging for UK Prime Minister Theresa May. Under pressure from Eurosceptics in her party, she had requested a short extension to 30 June. However, the EU insisted on a later date as it was keen to avoid a series of "rolling cliff edge" extensions. That said, the extension was not as long as had been suggested ahead of the summit, but, as expected, it is flexible. The extension can be cut short if the UK ratifies the withdrawal agreement (which the EU confirmed it is unwilling to renegotiate).

A review will also take place in June at which the UK will update other member states on progress towards a resolution. One consequence of the extension is that the UK must now participate in European elections in May, unless it ratifies the withdrawal agreement by the third week of May.

Brexit: key dates
	23-26 May: European Parliament elections. The outcome could have important implications for the future of the EU, and will be an important gauge of the level of support for populist and/or Eurosceptic parties across the continent 31 October: New scheduled date for the departure of the UK from the EU under terms of Article 50 of the Lisbon treaty. However, the UK could leave sooner if it ratifies a withdrawal agreement

What next?

UK cross party talks are likely to continue. If these fail, the government has signalled it could hold another round of so called "indicative votes" as a way to find a consensus in parliament on the type of Brexit it deems acceptable.

If the impasse continues, a general election could ensue. We would also not rule out UK lawmakers coalescing around the idea of a second referendum, which could have a version of the deal on the ballot paper.

Overall, a number of different Brexit options still remain possible:

- A "no-deal" scenario if the exit treaty still has not been passed
- An orderly exit based on ratification of the withdrawal agreement
- "No Brexit" e.g. if the UK votes to remain in another referendum, or the UK Parliament revokes Article 50 in order to avoid a "no deal" exit

Investment and macroeconomic implications

	UK economy: Positively, this extension takes a potentially disruptive "no-deal" Brexit off the table for six months. However, lingering uncertainty about the future UK-EU relationship is likely to continue weighing on economic performance
	Bank of England: Despite a strong labour market, and signs of building wage pressures (which could push up inflation), the Bank of England has been reluctant to raise interest rates amid Brexit uncertainty. This cautiousness is likely to continue for the time being
	Multi-asset portfolios: We believe UK equities are very attractively valued and investors are being rewarded for bearing downside risks. We continue to hold a positive view. We are underweight UK government bonds (gilts), which remain overvalued in our opinion

Investment in any market may be extremely volatile and subject to sudden fluctuations of varying magnitude due to a wide range of direct and indirect influences. Such characteristics can lead to considerable losses being incurred by those exposed to such markets. If an investment is withdrawn or terminated early, it may not return the full amount invested. In addition to the normal risks associated with investing, international investments may involve risk of capital loss from unfavourable fluctuations in currency values, from differences in generally accepted accounting principles or from economic or political instability in certain jurisdictions. Narrowly focused investments and smaller companies typically exhibit higher volatility. There is no guarantee of positive trading performance. Investments in emerging markets are by their nature higher risk and potentially more volatile than those inherent in some established markets. Economies in emerging markets generally are heavily dependent upon international trade and, accordingly, have been and may continue to be affected adversely by trade barriers, exchange controls, managed adjustments in relative currency values and other protectionist measures imposed or negotiated by the countries with which they trade. These economies also have been and may continue to be affected adversely by economic conditions in the countries in which they trade. Mutual fund investments are subject to market risks.
